2. Argumentation in essays

Social studies is a whole complex of different disciplines that form a holistic picture of society and the patterns of the social world as a whole.

Social studies is formed from the close connection between such sciences as philosophy, sociology, political science, economics, law - the whole complex is not considered in isolation, but as an integrated whole. To understand such a complex subject it is necessary to be able to conduct multi-level analysis, to think logically, and, of course, to read as much literature as possible.

Many of the students and graduates are faced with writing an essay on social studies - as a homework assignment, or on the unified state exam. This is one of the most difficult assignments. The essay is a small prose essay. It is written in free form.

The structure of the essay:

- Introduction (a quote, the problem raised and its relevance);
- Brief theses expressing the author's thoughts (describing the meaning of what is said, giving a subjective point of view);
- Supporting the thoughts with evidence (arguments);
- Conclusion (conclusion).

When writing a text you need to clearly and competently formulate your thoughts, logically highlight cause-effect connections, differentiate information, give examples from your own life, be able to argue all your conclusions. It is with the last of the above that many people have problems.

Argumentation in essays

Arguments in a social studies essay are those facts, cases from life, quotes from scientists, scientific evidence that are able to support the thesis. To be convincing, each statement should be supported by two arguments.

It is necessary to present the argument correctly:

Examples from your own life you can start like this: "I remember very well how in my life a similar case happened...", "despite the lack of a huge life experience, and in my life there was a similar situation...";

Argument from the lives of others: "I remember a story that my father (grandmother, friend, acquaintance, etc.) told me...";

Reference to authority: "a prominent writer (philosopher, scientist, artist, etc.) stated that...";

Experience from books: "recall an example from a great work...";

For successful essay writing, express your own point of view using various introductory word combinations: it seems to me, I think, my opinion about, allow myself to express, in my opinion, most likely, and so on.
